Well in my opinion a good parallel can be made between sport betting and bookmakers on the one hand and derivative pricing and market makers of those derivatives on the other hand.

Then if they are smart enough they shouldn't care about the statistics of the event itself, what they shall try to do is to balance their quotes with respect to the positions of their outstanding books.

This will make dynamically evolve the quotes of the events as the bets come to their books.

Of course the clients do care about statistics and so they will think twice before taking bets that rarely occur (or pay too much for it).

If you think at the market making of binary options, the situation is quite the same as the one with the bookie, but at the end what you get is the Risk Neutral Probability.

It is set by market participants and is in a way "an opinion".

This RN Probability is not always coherent with the statistics of the history of the underlying.

This however can make sense if all the market makers are in some way minimizing the aggregate risk of their returns (I don't explain the word "risk") Tj T* BT /
