Amazon Sues Thousands of Sellers of Fake Reviews (Again)

In a complaint with several paragraphs devoted to describing its own efforts to protect the integrity of the product review ecosystem, Amazon has sued over 11,000 Facebook groups that broker fake product reviews. As described in the complaint, filed in Washington state court, the defendants are alleged to have 'created and managed [Facebook] Groups that encourage and enable unscrupulous sellers to compensate reviewers for fake reviews.' The Groups, which Amazon alleges operate 'plain sight,' seek 'verified purchase reviews,' i.e., reviews from actual purchasers on Amazon. The reviewers are compensated by a 'refund' of the purchase price or other payment.

According to the complaint and Amazon's press release about the lawsuit, defendants' practices not only hurt consumers who rely on product reviews for their purchasing decisions but also the small and medium sized businesses selling on Amazon 'by creating an unfair playing field'.

While Amazon may be playing a long and costly game of whack-a-mole, it's clear that it -- along with other major retailers -- has come under increased pressure to clean up its product review system. Regulators have shown, through guidance, warnings and enforcement actions, that protecting the integrity of product reviews is a priority. And while pursuing the administrators of 11,000 Facebook
