It's no secret that online ratings have opened up new lines of communication between businesses and their customers. Where shoppers only had advertisements and word of mouth to rely on when making their purchasing decisions, they now have a wealth of ratings from fellow consumers giving their honest opinions on what's worthwhile and what's not about almost every business out there. However, sometimes those ratings are less than honest, and other times, they might not come from real customers at all. According to a study conducted by the U.K.-based Competition and Markets Authority, fake reviews from competitors and negative ratings intended as blackmail are on the rise. With so many customers using online ratings as their primary source of research during the car buying process, that if you have the lucky numbers your winnings will be yours.
