WrestleMania is WWE's Super Bowl, and this year's marquee event is particularly star-studded. On Sunday night, 20-year WWE vet Triple H will take on wre stling legend Sting, who steps into a WWE ring for the first time in a career th at spans three decades. The Undertaker is back following a shocking loss to Brock Lesnar a year ago, and Lesnar will be in this year's main event defending the WWE World Heavyweight Championship.

A wrestler's base salary can be diminished, however, in the event of in-ring injury. Multiple contracts stipulate that, should a wrestler suffer an in-ring injury that leaves him/her unable to perform for six consecutive weeks, then that twrestler's base salary will be reduced by 0.5% for every house show or TV taping missed thereafter. For every pay-per-view event in which a wrestler is unable to perform after that six week period, minimum pay will be reduced by the average pay received for the three previous PPV events (or 0.5% if the wrestler) Tj T* BT /

Live Events

On top of base salary and live event money, wrestlers are entitled to royalty in come. In the two most recent publicly available contracts - Triple H in 2012 and Stephanie McMahon in 2013 - wrestlers receive royalties from two different area s, namely product sales and non-wrestling appearances. Similar to live events, n either of these areas are described with much specificity but, as described belo w, older contracts established a rather detailed percentage breakdown. Regarding non-wrestling appearances, wrestlers are entitled to a share of profit s from those events to be mutually agreed upon between talent and WWE. A 'portion consistent with other top talent' is obviously not very illus
